Not only will this show the recruiters that you are serious about the position but will also help boost your confidence if any questions arise about how you would handle certain situations. -Practice your interview techniques You should have an extensive knowledge of your resume so that if any questions arise about it then you will know exactly how to answer them. If you get stuck, then always ask your interviewer if they have any questions about what you already know. -Listen to their feedback and follow up on it Be sure to ask the recruiters what would make them happy but be sure to state that you are not looking for a job title change, this is important because it shows that you are willing to listen and handle feedback. -Stay positive The best way to end up in a job interview slump is by thinking negatively. By staying positive, you will find yourself more open to new possibilities that can lead to new jobs or other opportunities. -Stay in contact with the recruiters Make sure you stay in contact with the recruiters on a regular basis. Not only will this show that you are passionate about their company but it will also put them into that happy place of knowing that you are still interested in their company. -Ask one extra question during the interview It is always good to ask one extra question during your interview. This shows that you are genuinely interested and that you care about the company and not just about yourself.
